Deaf children in poor communities have the right to a world class education too | Blog | Global Partnership for Education

Early education is the key. Preparing deaf children for school needs to start early. Across different developing countries, we’ve worked with partners to set up early intervention programs to work with deaf children and their primary care givers as early as possible, building the foundations in communication and language.

Globalisation may transform children’s learning in traditional societies

Drawing on anthropological literature, we suggest possible reasons for this difference in children’s learning. First, many small-scale, traditional societies have strict hierarchical relationships across generations that give adults greater authority over children. So a child asking lots of “why” questions might be thought of as challenging authority.

Defining Social-Emotional Learning | Harvard Graduate School of Education

The recent uptick in research on social-emotional learning frameworks and curriculum has meant that words like “resilience” and “self-control” are used by everyone from classroom teachers to state leaders. But not all stakeholders use these words in the same way, according to social-emotional intervention expert Stephanie Jones.
